Manekshaw was charismatic and known to be capable of charm. He was often described as a gentleman. His background as a Pilot is sometimes attributed as a factor in his ambition and success. He commanded great loyalty from his troops, particularly the Cactus, due to his reputation for personal bravery, fairness and his absence of punishments. He came into conflict with politicians because he stood up to their often unreasonable or unrealistic demands. They also disliked his propensity as they feared the possibility of a military coup. He dealt with politicians' demands through various means which were recognized by figures such as Indira Gandhi. Manekshaw also did not hesitate from advocating for better strategies than those developed by the civilian establishment, a trait rarely found in the military brass today.
